John Evans (1817-99) Bourne bird preserver

by REX NEEDLE

Taxidermy was a popular craft in Victorian times and many wild birds and animals were preserved in this way, mounted in glass cases or under glass domes to adorn the homes of our more affluent citizens.

Bourne became well-known for this animal artistry through the work of John Evans who practised from his workshop premises in West Street for fifty years until the close of the 19th century during which time he stuffed and preserved large numbers of rare and uncommon species that had been killed in the locality, many of which have since become extinct.

The first recorded example of his work comes from the summer of 1850 when a flight of curlews flew over Bourne and four of them were shot by a gamekeeper employed by landowner at Dyke. In the years that followed, he also preserved a red-backed shrike, peregrine falcons, hen harriers, honey buzzards, Bohemian waxwings, a Manx shearwater, a puffin and a bittern.

There were many more species and John Evans' reputation soon spread countrywide and he was also called on to preserve rare animals, usually displaying them when finished in the front window of his shop for passers-by to inspect before sending them off to his customers.

His clients included many famous people from among the titled and landed gentry, stately homes such as Burghley House, near Stamford, and Grimsthorpe Castle, near Bourne, and army officers serving in India who often sent home the skins of animals, including a tiger and a panther, for his attention.

But birds were his main preoccupation although by the end of his career, protest groups were springing up to prevent such practices, eventually leading to the formation of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds in 1899. He continued working until 1898 when he moved to Ely to live with relatives where he died in 1899, aged 83.

His work output appears to have been prodigious yet I have been unable to trace much of it, apart from a kestrel which is on display in Peterborough Museum, and I am trying to find other examples that may have survived in order to photograph them to illustrate my article on Evans for the history of Bourne.

Although stuffed birds no longer have the popular appeal that they commanded in Victorian times, there must be many still on show in the homes of our older residents who live in the Bourne area and if any has a glass case of stuffed birds then they must surely be the work of John Evans. If so, please get in touch and perhaps we could arrange for me to come along and take a photograph.

Our Mission Statement

It is the aim of the Society to make sure that new developments are of the highest possible quality and developers are made aware of the issues surrounding their schemes. Good design is only possible through a full understanding of any scheme's environment and urban context. We seek to safeguard our existing heritage and the many listed buildings from demolition or neglect.
